Math talk is the words you use to point out early math concepts in your everyday life with kids. Using your voice to talk aloud is a key way to support your child as they learn essential social, language and math skills before kindergarten. Research shows that talking, reading, or singing to young children, even before they are verbal, is one of the best ways you can support early brain development and set the stage for school success.

Math talk is a simple concept of talking about math out loud, and you don’t need to be a preschool teacher, have a math degree, or set aside designated time to do it. You can strengthen everyday conversations by adding a bit of math to the dialogue. When you incorporate math vocabulary into these language-rich experiences, you are helping children notice the math all around, says the Development and Research in Early Math Education Network.

As your child’s first teacher, you already have the expertise, skills and resources to use “math talk” regularly and often. You might start by adding small opportunities to use math talk during daily routines.

At breakfast, make a pattern with the foods on your plates — for example, cereal, banana slice, cereal, banana slice. You might ask, “Can you make a new pattern on your plate?” or talk aloud as you rearrange the food by color or size.

On the way to preschool, talk about how buildings, signs and cars are “next to,” “across from,” or “above” each other. These terms promote spatial sense (also called location and position words) and directional concepts.

At sports practice, point out the ways the coach sorts the players and organizes the equipment by their attributes, or the characteristics used to describe a group of objects. Say the player’s uniform number or the points scored. Notice the shape of the field and surrounding spaces.

Walking through the grocery store, find shapes like rectangle cereal boxes, round soup cans and the triangle top of a milk carton. Count the quantity of items out loud, and say the number on the price tag together.

At mealtime, talk through each step during prep. Have your child count or measure the ingredients. Order the steps in the process from the first, then second and third. Portion out the servings on plates and compare sizes using terms like “greater than,” “less than,” or “equal to.”

When reading at bedtime, count and order the number of books together from first, second and last. Remember, reading and talking are great predictors of academic success. Read books together whenever possible. Find the shapes, count the characters or notice patterns in the words for added math fun.

Once you add math talk to your daily routines, you might find how easy it is to continue the conversations into other learning experiences.

This summer, Melissa Gravert, our new Director of Educational Outreach and our WQPT PBS Ambassadors have visited nearly 50 libraries and community events throughout our viewing region. Children and their parents learn about programming, outreach resources and services. At each library stop, we present a PBS KIDS episode, read a story, play games, sing songs and offer a hands-on craft activity. Each child receives an activity bag with resources for learning at home.

While the events are fun for everyone, we are also raising station awareness to new viewers who can now receive our broadcast signal because of our new, more powerful transmitter, which was installed last year.

The fun continues in August—please join us! Learn more: wqpt.org/summer
