The “Caesar” Files

Burns, strangulation, broken bones: The list of signs of torture is long and can be seen on some 27,000 photos showing dead Syrian civilians. The man who smuggled the photos out of the country calls himself “Caesar.” For years, “Caesar” worked as a photographer for the Syrian military, taking pictures of civilians tortured to death and documenting their cases. Who are the dead, what was their fate, why did they disappear in Bashar al-Assad’s prisons? Throughout Europe, the families of the victims, supported by international lawyers, activists and “Caesar” himself, are searching for truth and justice. In doing so, they’re taking on the Syrian death machine and its most senior officials. How far can they go? DW broadcasts the two-part documentary The “Caesar” Files – Seeking Justice for Syria’s Victims of Torture.

EUROMAXX

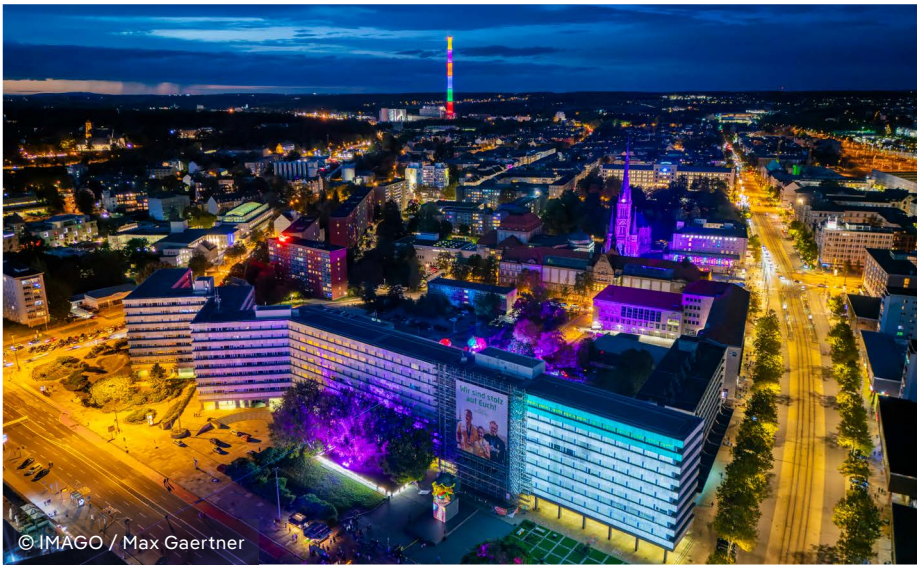

Future Food

How will we all satisfy our appetites in the future? The United Nations predicts the global population will rise to almost 10 billion by 2050. And with it, the world’s need for food. That’s why researchers are already busy developing alternative foodstuffs that are both climate-friendly and tasty. For example, a meat substitute made from mycelium – the part of a mushroom that normally grows underground. Or fish sticks partially grown from fish cells. Euromaxx investigates what the food of the future might look like. And runs it through some taste tests too!

ARTS UNVEILED

Capital of Culture: Chemnitz

Chemnitz is a European Capital of Culture 2025. Under the motto "C the Unseen," this major city in Saxony aims to present itself to guests as a vibrant, welcoming and surprising eastern German destination. It is also a bid to counteract its image as a place where right wing extremism thrives. Will the city cut it as a European metropolis? Or will this just end up being a localized navel-gazing exercise? With inauguration day fast approaching, the 2025 Capital of Culture project is gaining momentum. More in Arts Unveiled.

BUSINESS BEYOND

Chinese Overcapacity and the Global South

China generally has a big trade surplus, but domestic economic problems have pushed it into overdrive. The world's second largest economy is exporting on a massive scale. Critics call it overcapacity, but China says its simply trade. For many developing economies of the Global South, Chinese exports present risks to their own manufacturing bases, and many have responded with tariffs. This episode of Business Beyond considers how Chinese trade policy threatens many major developing economies and looks at the ways they are facing the challenge without sparking a direct confrontation with Beijing.

GLOBAL US

Inclusion – What Does it Actually Mean?

A question explored in a special edition of Global Us: Walking – for many people something that's taken for granted, for some impossible. That makes the work of Elena García Armada all the more important. The Spanish scientist is the inventor of the first ever exoskeleton for paralyzed children. This mechanical suit is helping many of them walk again. A special feature of García's exoskeleton is that it can be adjusted as the child grows. Also, the magazine reports from New York, where an activist and NGOs are campaigning for barrier-free metro stations. In addition, Global Us takes a look at India: How are trans people perceived there? What challenges do they face in their everyday lives in this country?
